Originally published: December 09, 2019 Last updated on 15 January 2021. popular idiomatic saying that works say more than words has been going on for centuries, but to this day, most people struggle with at least one area of nonverbal communication. Therefore, many of us tend to have safer body language, but do not have the knowledge and tools necessary to change what are largely unconscious behaviors. Given that other people's perceptions of our competence and self-confidence are predominantly influenced by what we do with our faces and bodies, it is important to develop greater self-awareness and consciously practice better posture, attitude, eye contact, facial expressions, hand gestures and other aspects of body language. First posturePrista: how is your posture? Let's start with the rapid self-assessment of your body. Are your shoulders down or rolling in an upright position? When you get up, distribute your weight evenly or lean excessively to one side? Does your natural attitude put your feet relatively shoulder width apart or are your feet and feet close together in a closed position? When you sit, whether your lower back protrudes in decline or maintains Spine-friendly posture in your seat? These are all important considerations when evaluating and improving your posture and attitude, which will eventually lead to more confident body language. If you routinely struggle to maintain good posture, consider buying a trainer/concealer posture, consulting with a chiropractor or physiotherapist, stretching daily and strengthening the core and back muscles. Facial expressionsAre you prone to any of the following in personal or professional environments? Bruxism (narrow, clenched jaw or tooth grinding) Brow frowning and/or furrowing Avoiding direct eye contact and/or staring at the ground If you responded to any of this, let's start by examining the various ways you can project confident body language through your facial expressions. 1. Understand how others perceive your facial expressions December 2020 study UC Berkeley and Google researchers used a deep neural network to analyze facial expressions in six million YouTube clips representing people from more than 140 countries. Research has shown that, despite socio-cultural differences, people around the world tend to use about 70% of the same facial expressions in response to different emotional stimuli and situations. The study researchers also published a fascinating interactive map to show how their machine learning technology evaluates different facial expressions and determines subtle differences in emotional responses. This study highlights the social importance of facial expressions because whether we are consciously aware of them - looking in the mirror or your screen on a video conference platform - how we present our faces to others can have a huge impact on their perception of us, our self-confidence and our emotional states. This awareness is an essential first step towards 2. Relax Your FaceNew Research on bruxism and facial tension has found that stresses and anxieties from locking up Covid-19 have led to a significant increase in orofacial pain, jaw clenching and teeth grinding, especially among women. The National Institute of Dental and Craniofacial Research estimates that only more than 10 million Americans have temporomandibular joint dysfunction (TMJ syndrome), and facial tension can lead to other complications such as insomnia, wrinkles, dry skin, and dark, swollen bags under the eyes.) To avoid these unpleasant outcomes, start practicing progressive muscle relaxation techniques and take breaks more often throughout the day to moderate facial tension. You should also try some biofeedback techniques to improve your awareness of involuntary bodily processes such as facial tension and achieve safer body language as a result. 3. Improve eye contactDid you know that there is a whole subspecies of kinesitic communication research dedicated to eye movements and behaviors called oculosics? It refers to various communication behaviours, including direct eye contact, eye avoidance, pupils and even the frequency of blinking. All of these traits can shape how other people perceive you, meaning eye contact is another area of nonverbal body language that we should look out for more in social interactions. The ideal type (direct/indirect) and duration of eye contact depends on various factors, such as cultural environment, differences in power/authority/age between the parties involved and communication context. Studies have shown that differences in the effects of eye contact are particularly prominent when comparing East Asian and Western European/North American cultures. To improve eye contact with others, strive to maintain consistent contact for at least 3 to 4 seconds at a time, consciously think about where you're looking while listening to someone else, and practice eye contact as much as possible (as strange as it may seem at first, it's the best way to improve).3 Smile MoreThere are many benefits for smiles and laughter, and when it comes to working on more confident body language, this is an area that should be fun, low stakes and relatively stress-free. Smiling is associated with the happiness of the chemical dopamine and the hormone that stabilizes mood, serotonin. Many empirical studies have shown that smiling in general leads to positive outcomes for a person smiling, and further research has shown that smiling can also affect the listener's perception of our self-confidence and credibility.4. Hand gesturesSimilar on facial expressions and posture, what you do with your hands while talking or listening in conversation can significantly affect other people's perceptions of you in positive or negative ways. It is undoubtedly challenging to consciously explain all your nonverbal signals while simultaneously trying to stay engaged with the verbal part of the discussion, but striving to develop more body awareness now will make it much easier to unconsciously project more confident body language later.5 Improve handlingU Article, Handshake Anthropology, Professor of Social Anthropology at the University of Copenhagen Bjarke Oxlund assessed the future of handshakes after the Covida-19 pandemic: Handshakes not only vary in function and meaning, but do so in accordance with the social context, situation and scale. . . a public debate should follow on the advantages and disadvantages of keeping the tradition of shaking hands as a conventional gesture of welcoming and taking leave in different circumstances. It is too early to determine some of the ways in which Covid-19 has permanently changed our social norms and professional standards of etiquette, but it is reasonable to assume that the handshake could retain its importance in American society even after this pandemic. To practice more confident body language in the meantime, the perfect handling science video below explains what you need to know.6. Complement your verbals with hand gesturesAs you know by Confident communication involves much more than smiling more or sounding like you know what you're talking about. What you do with your hands can be particularly influential in how others perceive you, whether you're scrunching up an object, clenching your fists, hiding your hands in your pockets, or gesturing calmly to emphasize important points you discuss. Social psychology researchers have found that iconic gestures - hand gestures that seem to be meaningfully related to the verbal content of speakers - can have a profound impact on the retention of listener information. In other words, people are more likely to engage with you and remember more what you said when you speak with complementary hand gestures instead of just by voice. Further research on hand gestures has shown that even your choice of left or right hand for gestures can affect your ability to clearly convey information to listeners, which supports the idea that more confident body language is easily achievable through greater self-awareness and deliberate nonverbal actions. Final TakeawaysDeveloping better posture, improving facial expressiveness and practicing hand gestures can greatly improve your communication with other people. At first, it will be challenging to consciously practice nonverbal behaviors that many of us are used to performing daily without thinking about them. If you ever feel discouraged, however, remember that there is no downside to consistently putting in just a little more time and effort to increase your physical awareness. With the tips and strategies above, you will be on your way to accepting safer body language and reinforcing other people's perceptions of you at any time.
